FUND MANAGER'S COMMENTARY

The Asian USD bond market (as represented by the JP Morgan Asia Credit Index) posted a -0.85% return over the month of February. Contributing to the negative returns for the segment was the monthly rise in US Treasury yields, while a weakening of investor sentiment in the month coincided with a widening of Asian credit spreads. Credit spread widening was particularly evident in the sovereign segment, with Asian sovereign bonds a key underperformer over the month.

Even as global economic momentum continued to gather strength over the month, investor risk aversion returned, with investors focusing on signs of inflation and potential rate hikes. The month started with a higher-than-expected reading on the US average hourly earnings measure, raising concerns about possible wage-push inflation, while January's CPI reading also came in above expectations. Jerome Powell was sworn in as the 16th Chairman of the US Federal Reserve ("Fed"), and painted a fairly robust picture of US economic growth in his first testimony to Congress, an indication that the Federal Reserve would stay the course to normalise rates in 2018. Minutes from the January 2018 Federal Open Market Committee meeting also corroborated this, with "a majority of participants" noting that "a stronger outlook for economic growth raised the likelihood that further gradual policy firming would be appropriate".

Against this backdrop of rising inflation scrutiny by investors, yields traded in a more volatile fashion, with the 2-year, 5-year and 10-year US Treasury yields finishing the month between 11 and 16 bps higher. The 10-year US Treasury yield, a bellwether for longer term US rates, surged to an intra-month high of 2.95% in February, the highest level since January 2014, before easing marginally lower to close the month at 2.86%.

Along with the impact of higher US Treasury yields, credit spreads widened across the Asian credit space in February, contributing to overall performance weakness. Asian sovereign bonds were a notable underperformer in February – the non-investment grade sovereign segment saw appreciable spread widening, while the long-duration Asian investment grade sovereign segment was hurt by the rise in base rates, as evidenced by the weak performance for longer-dated Indonesia and Philippines USD denominated bonds. By country, the Maldives, Sri Lanka and Indonesia were key underperformers in the month.
